

From Disneyland to Halloween?

Though the EMS moves forward, insanity rules in Washington

Political metaphor became all-too-sensuous reality last week when the President of the United States used Disneyworld as the forum from which to tell 2,500 leaders of American business that Camp David was a roaring success. All the evidence indicates that the unchallenged hegemony of Zbigniew Brzezinski, Henry Kissinger, and through them the City of London, over the Carter Administration's foreign, monetary, and domestic policy has plunged not only the U.S. leadership but, apparently, leading corporate, financial, and other business circles into a mass-psychosis Fantasyland.

Camp David brought "peace in our time," says the Administration, and as we go to press, the fighting in Lebanon is quickly approaching all-out Mideast war, with the imminence of a U.S.-Soviet showdown not far behind (see INTERNATIONAL).

The way to "defend the dollar" is to throw the U.S. into recession and strangle development of the Third World altogether, say the White House and various business spokesmen — while the European, Japanese, and Arab proponents of the "Grand Design" world development strategy come under fire from Washington as "antidollar" for their efforts to provide the U.S. currency and the U.S. economy with a real way out of the crisis. The dollar's continued plunge on the world markets only confirms the lunacy of current U.S. monetary policy.

The psychology of the process now in force in the White House is all too clear. A clinically psychotic policy-making doctrine has been imposed top-down on all aspects of the Administration, and any facts that betray the insanity of the Brzezinski policy line are being deliberately, obsessively ignored. With Disneyland already here, the obvious next step is Halloween.

What's going on out there?

Fortunately the fate of the world does not rest entirely in the hands of Jimmy Carter. West German Chancellor Schmidt, French President Giscard d'Estaing, Japanese Premier Fukuda, and their allies in the Arab countries, the Third World, and the Soviet sector are racing ahead to effect full implementation of the new European Monetary System and the associated program of global high-technology-based economic expansion (See ECONOMICS). They are also moving directly to intervene into the Middle East, with a combination of public initiatives and private diplomatic moves for a Geneva solution to the Camp David mess.

So dramatic has this motion become that Great Britain, the policy motherland of the psychosis dominating Washington, is howling with rage and terror. Fascist

Enoch Powell has declared that the European Monetary System threatens to win the "war of conquest they (France and West Germany) are waging against the United Kingdom," while, from the opposite bench, the Labour Party has issued its own rejection of the EMS, on the grounds, according to East German radio reports, that it is an "imperialist scheme."

Less publicly, the strategists of London are even now deciding whether to deploy their Israeli puppet into open war on Lebanon to stop the reportedly effective, Soviet-backed Syrian actions against the Israeli- and London-run Falange. They may indeed be desperate enough to go for a full-scale East-West confrontation, as the "lesser evil" compared to the political and economic obliteration of City of London power that the European Monetary System drive portends.

That London and its allies are indeed fully that insane should not be doubted — look at what that outlook has already wrought on the mental processes of America's leadership. But as long as the power of the United States remains in their grip, the future of the world remains in grave doubt.

The efforts of Schmidt, Giscard, and the rest could well be for naught unless the U.S. Administration is quickly dragged back into reality.
