

Cleveland's message to Kennedy

Some important conclusions are to be drawn from the pattern of voting in the Nov. 6 local elections across the United States. In at least four key U.S. cities—Boston, Cleveland, San Francisco, and Buffalo—the message to prognosticators of the 1980 presidential race is that Senator Edward M. Kennedy, who announced his candidacy for the Democratic nomination officially on Nov. 7, is already in a good deal of trouble. Some observers are even asking if the intention of the Kennedy candidacy is to hopelessly split the party and ensure its defeat next year.

Perhaps the most significant of the black eyes voters gave the Kennedy machine occurred in Cleveland, where radical-liberal Mayor Dennis Kucinich went down to defeat despite his endorsement by such Kennedyite celebrities as Jane Fonda and Ralph Nader. Cleveland, a city where registered Democrats outnumber Republicans 7 to 1, elected a Republican, Ohio Lt. Governor George Voinovich to replace the "boy mayor" whose two-year term had all but destroyed a once proud city.

The defeat (by implication) for Senator Kennedy was delivered by the very same white-ethnic and black combination of voters that is commonly referred to as his "base." And the timing, on the eve of the Massachusetts Senator's formal announcement of his presidential candidacy, could not have been more ominous. Observers around the country noted that last spring, when the reelection of Kucinich seemed probable, the Democratic Party of Cleveland's Cuyahoga County went on record as the first in the nation to endorse Kennedy.

Kucinich's defeat was effected by the combined efforts of the LaRouche Democratic presidential campaign organization, the anti-Kucinich Democratic black machine on Cleveland's east side, and white ethnic machines on the west side.

In Buffalo, the Democratic candidate for Erie County Executive, Frank McGuire, who had been personally endorsed a week before at a rally by Ted Kennedy, was trounced by a 2-to-1 margin as the result of a revolt in Democratic ranks. Boston Mayor Kevin White won a landslide victory against avowed Kennedyite Joseph Timilty. In San Francisco, the liberal Dianne Feinstein machine has been forced into a runoff in the mayoral and District Attorney races.

Very clearly, the mood in the American electorate is not going toward the brand of radical-liberalism that Kennedy represents. Nor, as many observers have pointed out, did Kennedy's television interviews over the previous weekend on the subject of Chappaquiddick redeem his political fortunes. Those willing to look past the unanswered questions about the "incident" could hardly overlook the candidate's downright incoherency.

Last spring, we predicted that the New York Council on Foreign Relations would field two priggish nominees in the 1980 election—Alexander Haig for the Republicans, and Ted Kennedy for the Democrats. We also noted that Lyndon LaRouche's candidacy on a program openly counterposed to the CFR's plans and its habit of preselecting the presidential choices could upset that scenario, which called for Haig (or a stand-in, like current GOP frontrunner John Connally) to win the election.

Our international friends should now look closely at the outlook on the 1980 vote, just one year away. The CFR appears more than willing to destroy the Democratic Party entirely with a Carter-Kennedy showdown, in order to prevent the "LaRouche option" from succeeding. But LaRouche now stands an excellent chance of reaping the disaffected Democratic (and Republican) vote that said goodbye to Dennis Kucinich in Cleveland.

The Week in Brief

The Carter administration has embarked on a plan to shut down nuclear power in the United States for good. Already the Nuclear Regulatory Commission has declared a temporary moratorium on the licensing of seven nuclear plants about to come into operation. The NRC is also considering a Three Mile Island Commission recommendation that all nuclear plants located within 10 miles of a major urban center be shut down.

Furthermore, by fostering a climate of hysteria, the NRC has contributed to the closing of five out of six of the nation's commercial nuclear waste disposal sites—thus threatening the shutdown of all nuclear fission plants as well as vital cancer and medical diagnostics and treatment.
