

Establishment Figures Demand That Candidates Address Pressing Issues

by William Jones

In two conferences in Washington at the beginning of September, angry voices have been raised by leading political figures about the paucity of discussion that had hitherto been held on the major issues facing the nation in this election campaign. In what Lyndon LaRouche characterized as the most important election in U.S. history, the political debate in the first weeks of the Presidential campaign consisted largely of attacks by the Karl Rove-instigated medley of discontents, the "Swift Boat Veterans for Truth," whose sole interest has been to besmirch the military record of Democratic candidate John Kerry, a decorated Vietnam veteran, and the fending off of those attacks by the Kerry campaign. Rove's candidate, President George Bush, has no military record to speak of, having come much closer in his brief time in uniform to a dressing-down than to a decoration. And thanks to the intervention of Lyndon LaRouche and the LaRouche Youth Movement, and of President Clinton, the Kerry campaign has finally started to revamp its campaign team and go on the offensive.

One of the establishment critics, former Indiana Congressman Lee Hamilton, the vice chairman of the 9/11 Commission, said in a speech on Sept. 14 to the Dwight Eisenhower National Security Conference, an annual event sponsored jointly by the U.S. Army and the Atlantic Council of the United States: "In this critical period in the life of our nation, you and I should expect, indeed demand, that candidates for President tell us how they will provide leadership for extraordinary times. Otherwise we leave tomorrow's history to chance, not choice." The voters indeed must take their responsibility for the future of the nation. The responsibility of the candidates is to explain what they hoped to accomplish with the power of the Presidency.

The Eisenhower National Security Conference on Sept. 14-15 brought together military officers, business people, as well as political and intelligence analysts from around the country to discuss the important national security issues facing the nation in the aftermath of Sept. 11, 2001.

Speaking the day before at another event, the 13th Annual Arab-U.S. Policymakers Conference, Chas W. Freeman, Jr., the former ambassador to Saudi Arabia and former Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs, had delivered a scathing critique of U.S. government policy in the Arab world. Freeman demanded that the two candidates begin to debate these issues in order to provide the American population with an idea of what they were voting for.

The Arab-U.S. Policymakers Conference is an annual event that brings together a variety of people, former ministers, journalists, think-tankers, military personnel, and political leaders from the United States and the Arab world.

Both Hamilton and Freeman presented their list of important topics that they felt must be dealt with in the campaign. It was not by coincidence that most of these topics were the same: dealing with the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, resolving the quagmire in Iraq, how to deal with Iran, how to form our relationship with the Muslim world as a whole, how to deal with the North Korean nuclear program, relations with Russia, relations with China, how to deal with the Darfur crisis, how to stabilize Afghanistan.

The Economic Crisis

Among both these groups, the issue of the looming collapse of the U.S. economy, about which Lyndon LaRouche has spoken as a veritable Cassandra, remained ever-present as a topic, sometimes only a dim foreboding shadow in the background. Ambassador Freeman said: "With some of our most senior economists telling us that there is a 75% chance of a dollar collapse sometime over the next five years, I think it might be helpful for you [the two candidates] to tell us what you propose to do about the budget, trade, and balance of payments deficits that threaten both our national prosperity and the global economy."

Hamilton also touched upon the global economic issues, including global poverty and AIDS.

Democratic liberal economist Clyde Prestowitz, in his concise presentation at the U.S.-Arab Policymakers Conference, developed a scenario in which Japan and China withdrew their holdings in dollars to invest in European currencies. This threat of a pull-out of the dollar by our major creditors because of the huge deficit that the United States is running to finance the war in Iraq and in Afghanistan, was also underlined in a keynote speech at the Eisenhower National Security Conference, by Gen. Montgomery Meigs (ret.), the former commander of U.S. forces in Bosnia. He underlined for his audience of largely uniformed military the importance of financial stability as a primary national security concern of the United States.

Ambassador Chas Freeman addresses a news conference on June 16, of the Diplomats and Military Commanders for Change. The bipartisan group of 27 retired generals, admirals, and ambassadors, called for the Bush-Cheney Administration to be swept out of office in November. Since that press conference, the momentum has been building, for a drastic change in Washington policy. Left to right: Freeman, Amb. Phyllis Oakley, Amb. Robert Oakley, Amb. Donald Easum, and Amb. Donald McHenry.

In the interest of shifting the political discussion away from those phony “wedge issues” that Rove and Company would like to place in the foreground during the election campaign, in order to shift voters from voting on the issues to voting on the innuendo of concocted charges, we present some of these important conference presentations to our readers.

‘The Serious Questions Are Being Ignored’

The National Council on U.S.-Arab Relations (NCUSAR) held its 13th annual conference in Washington on Sept. 12-13, attended by about 300 oil industry executives, diplomats, journalists, and Middle East political activists. Chas Freeman, who was an Undersecretary of Defense and the U.S. ambassador to Saudi Arabia, delivered these closing remarks. Subheads have been added.

Once again, I have been honored by the National Council on U.S.-Arab Relations and stand before you to offer a few thoughts on where we—Americans and Arabs—go from here. Rereading what I said to this conference about this in 2001, 2002, and 2003, I am pleased to find that I got a few things right. This year I am far less confident I can see the future.

Seven weeks before elections in this country, neither candidate is saying much, if anything, about how he would address the very serious problems he will confront at home and abroad, including in the Middle East. Instead, the parties are engaged in an embarrassingly trivial debate about whether John Kerry really earned his silver star in Vietnam and whether George Bush did or did not make himself available to bomb the Vietcong if they turned up in Alabama. This is too bad. There are a lot of serious questions before our country, our army, and our people. What we decide and do greatly affect the world.

‘Most Erratic’ Foreign Policy

The past four years have established what honesty compels me to describe as without doubt the most erratic foreign policy record in our history. 9/11 showed the Administration’s early obsession with national missile defense and indifference to more conventional terrorist threats to have been fundamentally in error. Fortunately, the President reacted effectively by rallying the country to fight the “terrorists with global reach” who had attacked us.

But no sooner had we successfully dispersed al-Qaeda’s leaders and punished their hosts in Afghanistan, than we lurched off “in search of” other “monsters to destroy” and invaded Iraq. Ill-defined as they were, our objectives and priorities in that new battlefield shifted with kaleidoscopic ease under the ministrations of the spin-doctors. WMD, then democratization. Deba’athification, then remobilization. Im-
