

Yes, It's Really That Bad

The first step toward developing a strategy to deal with any crisis, should obviously be to understand exactly how serious it is, and where it is leading. It's on that basic level that most American citizens, especially leading ones, are failing miserably. They would rather say to themselves, "Things are bad, but they're not that bad."

So, let's start from a sampling of how bad things really are.

First, we have the short-term danger of triggering a wider war, most likely in the region of Southwest Asia, which would rapidly turn into an implicitly thermonuclear confrontation between the United States and NATO, and Russia, in particular. An escalation in Syria or Iran could easily bring this about, any day now.

Second, we have the globally extended 9/11 Two crisis, generated by collusion between the British and Saudi monarchies, with the ongoing complicity of the Obama Administration—which threatens the eruption of global chaos also headed toward World War III.

Third, we have the combined hyperinflationary/physical economic disaster of the trans-Atlantic nations, which is leading to increasing death rates, food shortages, and potential social breakdown.

And perhaps the worst, we have no qualified candidate running for President. The incumbent President Barack Obama is a would-be Führer, who violates the Constitution at will, and prides himself on taking "personal responsibility" for mass killings, through drone strikes and other means, while his opponent professes his commitment to the very same disastrous economic and geopolitical policies which have brought the world into the crisis it's now in.

There are clearly many people who recognize this reality, most of whom decide to hope against hope that they will survive anyway. A few are brave individuals, like those who participated in Rep. Walter Jones' press conference on his House Concurrent Resolution 107, on Sept. 21, in order to speak up about the danger which the Executive's usurpation of the power to declare war represents. Read their words carefully. These are men with decades of experience and study—and they are demanding that Congress, and you, act to protect our republic, now.

What these brave individuals left unsaid, is what Lyndon LaRouche and his political movement are providing: the immediate solution to the crisis. It starts with removing the British monarchy's hand from the thermonuclear button, by expelling Obama from the Presidency, Constitutionally and for cause. Impossible, you say? Well, it wasn't impossible to get Richard Nixon to resign. Nor was it impossible for the Berlin Wall to fall. These were not scheduled events—but the result of actions by people who understood that they had to reject the usual "practical" ways of doing things, and insist on immediate change.

For example, there's nothing but a lack of sense of reality, and political will, preventing Congressional leaders from coming back into session to deal with the crises at hand, starting with Obama, and moving directly on to the reimposition of the firewall of protection we need for our financial system—Glass-Steagall. Without such actions, frankly, the whole "election" is a deadly charade.

We live in extraordinary times, with an unprecedented level of danger to the continuation of human civilization itself. Such times demand extraordinary leadership, from all layers of the population. Once you face reality, you'll be surprised at what you can do.
